how to spend it

THE COOL OF THE WILD
RIPPING ACROSS
AN ARCTIC ICESCAPE

THE FRIDAY EDITION OCTOBER 10 2014
HOT DESKING

Home desks are undergoing a renaissance as technology becomes more compact, allowing the designs to shine. Rose Swingsley reports.

Echoes of constructivism and futurism are reflected in Wolfs’s creation, while Jonathan Boring takes inspiration from the utilitarian pieces made by sculptor Donald Judd in the 1960s.

Furniture by Donald Judd, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Judd was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Furniture by Jonathan Boring, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Boring was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Hot desks are becoming more popular as technology becomes more compact, allowing the designs to shine. Rose Swingsley reports.

Furniture by Donald Judd, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Judd was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Furniture by Jonathan Boring, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Boring was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Hot desks are becoming more popular as technology becomes more compact, allowing the designs to shine. Rose Swingsley reports.

Furniture by Donald Judd, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Judd was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Furniture by Jonathan Boring, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Boring was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Hot desks are becoming more popular as technology becomes more compact, allowing the designs to shine. Rose Swingsley reports.

Furniture by Donald Judd, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Judd was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.

Furniture by Jonathan Boring, which was made in the 1960s, features simple lines and a utilitarian approach. Boring was known for his minimalist works, which often incorporated industrial materials and a practical design ethos.